RecordClick Adds Editorial Services to Assist Customers in Creating Historical Narratives

Denville, New Jersey – On the heels of its announcement to add Legacy Books to its genealogical services and offerings, RecordClick.com is adding Editorial Services to its roster to support the creation of its legacy publications. RecordClick genealogists now compile scanned photographs, documents, timelines, textual summaries, and other ancestor search memorabilia to create a printed Legacy Book that serves as a personal family history publication – one that can be touched, read, and handed down through generations. Adding Editorial Services will assist customers who are dealing with family journals and written historical accounts that have yet to be compiled into a chronological narrative.

"Some of our customers, who are in possession of journals and other writings that have been handed down throughout generations, need help in bringing together these accounts and anecdotes to compose a cohesive chronicle that will resonate with generations to come," explains Elizabeth Khan, Founder and CEO of RecordClick. "Our clients, especially those researching Jewish genealogy, are in possession of many relatives' stories – some transmitted by oral tradition – and they want them compiled into a family history narrative. More times than not, however, there is more research needed to fill in the holes. That's where our professional genealogists come into play."

On staff with RecordClick are professional writers and editors who possess several decades of experience and expertise in interviewing, creative writing, editing, authoring books, scriptwriting, and wordsmithing. These skills, combined with the rich stories gathered by family history researchers, result in an historical account that tells a personal story about a particular family. RecordClick editors craft these stories to follow a logical progression. Making sure they are supported by historical documentation, the stories are compiled and edited to be interesting, compelling, and entertaining.

"Not only do we already help our clients make video biographies and family history videos, but we even help them script their productions," says Khan. "However, some of our clients aren't ready for the bells and whistles that are involved with electronic media production – they just want their story told succinctly. That's why we feel compelled to offer editorial services to our customers . . . to help them tell their story."
